THREE FOR THREE

The Star-Telegram arts writers spotlight what's rocking their world this week.

1 Art windows at Neiman Marcus: Artists, curators and publishers have been given free rein to interpret the Dallas Art Fair and display their conceptualizations in the windows of Neiman Marcus in downtown Dallas. The fair opens April 7, and the window displays will come down when it closes April 10. To see this hybrid retail relationship, developed by fair co-founder Chris Byrne and artist Richard Patterson, visit the corner of North Ervay and Main streets in Dallas.

2 Homefront: No better evidence that video games are fast catching up to movies as popular entertainment exists than the fact that acclaimed screenwriter John Milius (Apocalypse Now, among other films) provided the foundation for this first-person shooter, in stores for Xbox, PS3 and PC. Homefront, a bleak tale of survival and violence in a futuristic world run by the fictional Greater Korean Republic, is as visceral as it is thoughtful.

3 Treme: The Complete First Season on DVD: David Simon and Eric Overmyer's sprawling HBO series about post-Katrina New Orleans is messier and more preachy than Simon's previous effort, The Wire. Still, it is filled with great music and good performances, especially by Khandi Alexander, John Goodman and Melissa Leo. The DVD set, out Tuesday, features episode commentaries as well as commentaries about the series' music.
